that wouldn't necessarily have to be there if we had this facility.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But what I'm saying, Senator Engel,...

SENATOR COORDSEN PRESIDING

SENATOR COORDSEN: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...is that there's a difference between those who would be eligible for this camp and those who would get it, just like there's a difference between those who would be eligible for probation and would get it. Judges sometimes can be mean or vindictive and send somebody to prison because they can under the law when, if they were what you and I might consider sensitive and fair, would give that person a chance. But aside from all of that, if you give judges another place to lock people up, judges are going to lock people up, and prosecutors are going to try to have them locked up. So this is not going to alleviate any present overcrowding, because nobody who is serving their sentence now can be put in one of these places. The only one who can mitigate a sentence, once it's imposed by the court, is the Pardon's Board. So those people locked up are off the table as a part of this equation.

SENATOR COORDSEN: Time. Senator Chambers, we changed presiding officers after you started to speak, and your light is still on. I don't know whether it was turned off. Did you wish to speak one more time, which would be your third time? Okay, Senator Chambers, then.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Mr. President. Since this is my last time, I got to marshal my resources and make the best use of them. Oh, I see Senator Hartnett. Thank you, Senator Hartnett. An ever-present help in the time of trouble. Senator Tyson will sit there and make nice expressions at me and then not give me any time, although he did one time, and it was on an issue where he and I were disagreeing. But nevertheless, this is one of those matters, Senator Engel, that I take very seriously. You and I probably are the only ones who are going to discuss it, that's why I want the opportunity to do so. But rather than see all of this money spent for something which is
